

Synopsis of the Books of the Bible

Philemon

John Nelson Darby (1800-1882)

Public domain edition

The very beautiful and interesting Epistle to Philemon does not require much comment: it is an expression of the love which works by the Spirit within the Church in all the circumstances of individual life.

Written for the purpose of awakening sentiments in Philemon, which certain events had a tendency to extinguish in his heart, this epistle is more suited to produce those feelings in the reader, than to be the object of explanation.

It is a fine picture of the way in which the tenderness and the strength of the love of God, working in the heart, occupies itself with every detail wherein that love might be wounded, or that might be an occasion for its growth and manifestation. In this point of view the epistle is as important as beautiful ; for this development of tender and delicate consideration in the midst of the apostle's gigantic labours, and of the immense truths that formed the basis of relationship between all creatures and God in Christ, gives a very peculiar character to Christianity, and shews its divine nature; since He who reveals the most profound truths, and puts them in their right place in the circle of divine thought, does so as speaking of a known thing, as communicating His ~ own thoughts; and can (being the Spirit of the God of love) fill the heart with considerations which love only can suggest, with a dignity which manifests their source,

Pe Slee — sv on

and with a delicacy of application which shews that, whatever be the grandeur of His thoughts, He is liberty to consider everything, When the human mind is occupied with elevated subjects, it feels their weight, and bends under the load is absorbed; it has to abstract itself, to fix its attention. God reveals His own thoughts; and, vast as they may be to the human mind, they flow with the clearness and connectedness that is natural to them, when He communicates them by His chosen instruments. The latter free to love ; for the God who employs them and them is love. It is a more essential part of their to present Him thus than even to speak of the deeper things. Accordingly, when they are moved by the love, the character of Him who sends them is demonstrated as that of the God who is the source of love, | a perfect consideration for others, and the most delicate attention to those things which their hearts would. Moreover, this love develops itself in relationship formed by the Holy Ghost Himself, between the

Springing from a divine source, and always fed christian affections assume the form of human which, by exhibiting love and the opposite of selfishness bear the stamp of their origin. Love, free from self, can and does think of all that concerns others, and understands what will affect them. Onesimus, a fugitive slave, had been converted by means of Paul in his bonds. Philemon, a rich man, or at least one of easy fortune, received the assembly house (his wife being also converted), and, in his me laboured himself in the Lord's work. Archippus was a servant of the Lord, who ministered in the assembly, perhaps an evangelist; at any rate he took part in the conflicts of the gospel, and was thus associated with Philemon and the assembly.

The apostle, in sending Onesimus back, addresses the whole assembly. This is the reason that we have here, "grace and peace," without the addition of "mercy," as when individuals only are addressed by the apostles. His appeal on behalf of Onesimus is to Philemon; but the whole assembly is to interest itself in this beloved slave, who was become a child of God. Their christian hearts would be a support and a guarantee for the conduct of Philemon; although the apostle expects pardon and kindness for Onesimus from the love of Philemon

Paul himself as a servant of God. Paul (as was his custom) recognizes all the good that was in Philemon, and uses it as a motive to Philemon himself, that he might let the feelings of grace flow out freely, in spite of anything that the return of Onesimus might excite in the flesh, or any displeasure that Satan might try to re-awaken in him. The apostle would have Paul do that which he desired for Onesimus to be Philemon's own act. The enfranchisement of his former slave, or Paul even his kind reception as a brother, would have quite a different bearing in that case, than if it had arisen from a command on the apostle's part; for christian affection and the bonds of love were in question. He gives due weight to the right he had to command, but only in order to abandon it, and to give more force to his request; and at the same time he suggests that the communion of Philemon's faith with the whole Church with the apostle—i.e., the way in which his faith connected him, in the activities of christian love, with the Church of God and those appointed by Him to be in it, and with the Lord Himself—which had shewn itself so honourably in Philemon, would have full development in the acknowledgment of all the apostle's rights over his heart. (In verse 6, we usually read "every good thing which is in us.")

It is beautiful to see the mixture of affection for Onesimus—which shews itself in an anxiety that he should plead every motive which could act on the heart of Philemon—with the christian feeling that inspired with full confidence in the kindly affections of this full and excellent brother. The return of his former slave was indeed likely to stir up something in a natural heart; the apostle interposes his letter on behalf of his dear child in the faith, born in the time of captivity. God had interposed the work of His Spirit which ought to act on the heart of Philemon, produce altogether new relationships with Onesimus. The apostle beseeches him to receive his former slave as a brother but it is evident (ver. 21), although Paul wished to be the spontaneous act of the master whom Onesimus had wronged, that the apostle expected the enfranchisement of the latter. Be that as it may, he takes the thing upon himself for his dear son. According to Onesimus was more profitable to Philemon, as well Paul, than formerly, when the flesh had made him unfaithful and valueless servant; and this he should rejoice in. (Ver. 11.) Paul alludes to the name

Onesimus," which means "profitable." Finally, he tells Philemon that he was indebted to him for his

Paul at this moment was a prisoner at Rome. God brought Onesimus there (whither all resorted) to salvation and the knowledge of the Lord, in order that we should be instructed, and that Onesimus should have a new position in the christian Church.* It was apparently towards the end of the apostle's imprisonment. He hopes at least to be soon released, and Philemon to prepare him a lodging. We find the names again in the Epistle to the Colossians—There the apostle says, "Onesimus, who is one of us;" so that, if it be the same, he was of Colosse. It is not likely, because there is Archippus also, who is exhorted to take heed to his ministry. If it be so, then he speaks thus of Onesimus to the Christians

There is another proof of his loving care for this convert, He lays him thus upon the hearts of the

Paul tells the Ephesians there are no strangers as Tychicus is its bearer. Timothy is joined Paul in the address of the Epistle to the Colossians, as well as in this to Philemon. It was not so in the

seems to me, from the way in which the apostle speaks, he even thought Onesimus would be an instrument of God's Church, useful in the Lord's service. He would have rehim to minister to himself in the bonds of the gospel ; but to his connection with Philemon. It was also much the soul of Onesimus that he should submit himself had done wrong; and if he was to be free, that he receive his freedom from the love of Philemon.

Epistle to the Ephesians ; but in that to the Philippians, to whom the apostle hoped to send Timothy ere long their two names are again united. I do not draw any conclusions from these last but they furnish ground for inquiry into details, of the four epistles was written during the apostle's captivity at Rome, and when he was about to be delivered from that captivity. Finally, that which we have especially to remark the Epistle to Philemon is the love which, in ' intimate centre of this circle (guarded all round by unparalleled development of doctrine) reigned bore fruit, and bound the members of Christ and spread the savour of grace over all the ships in which men could stand towards him occupying itself about all the details of life perfect propriety, and with the recognition of every right that can exist among men, and of all that the human heart can feel,